

Trade Union
Education for All

Ideas and Methods

Context

Many unions are encouraging members to educate others to strengthen workplace organization.

This course is designed to assist those undertaking such training at being even more effective at it. Passing on knowledge and inspiring others is something that can be improved by learned techniques.

As Doug has said 'Education is embedded in the very core of trade union work. Becoming a better educator means becoming a better trade unionist' (Nicholls, 2017). Yet much trade union education is technical and class room bound, with the tutor as the teacher and the students as the learners, ignoring the wealth of knowledge and experience participants bring. This needs to change.

Intended Audience and Course aims

Aimed not just at trainers but every union member, these courses will develop new skills to help you persuade, recruit, inform, negotiate, educate and inspire learners, creating opportunities for people to change their lives, and the lives of those they work with.

This course will enable you to communicate ideas and information more effectively and develop more of a role in supporting learning and activism in your Union using the traditions of popular education, which are at the core of youth and community work and informal education.

Over the duration of this course, we will explore opportunities for effective learning, from canteen discussions to formal training sessions. The course will also explore teaching in the post pandemic reality. Blended learning will be foregrounded.

Course structure

The course will initially be delivered as an overnighter, from early evening to lunch time the next day, at Quorn Grange Hotel, followed by online support to develop your ideas, and a further day the following month.

There are no exams or formal assessment although we would like participants to present their learning from the course through the presentation of a real or intended learning event on the follow up day.

It would be helpful if participants came with an idea for an educational project in mind, which we will all help you develop.
